UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS RESERVE,

for service as set forth in the following

CITATION:

"For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity while serving with Company I, Third Battalion, Twenty-second Marines (Reinforced), First Provisional Marine Brigade, Third Amphibious Corps, during action against enemy Japanese forces on Guan, Marianas Islands, 25 July 1944. When the advance of his company was held up by rifle, machine-gun and mortar fire, Private First Class Yahara helped guide supporting tanks forward to neutralize enemy strong points and, braving enemy fire, ran from one tank telephone to another to designate Japanese targets. His initiative and devotion to duty reflect the highest credit upon Private First Class Yahara and the United States Naval Service."

"For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity while serving as a Rifleman in a platoon of Company L, Third Battalion, Fourth Marines, Sixth Marine Division, during action against enemy Japanese forces at Okinawa in the Ryukyu Chain on 22 May 1945. When a bursting artillery shell hit near by and blew two Marines from their foxholes onto the open ground, Private First Class Yoakum heard the cries of the wounded men above the terrific noise created by the furious shelling and, unhesitatingly leaving the comparative safety of his own foxhole, braved a deadly rain of bullets in a valiant effort to rescue his companions. Grasping one of the men in his arms, he carried him to a defiladed area where a corpsman could administer first aid and, without a moment's rest, returned through the shattering barrage to bring back the other. Dazed and mortally wounded by a second shellburst, he struggled to his feet with his burden and, struggling desperately, succeeded in returning his companion to safety before he himself collapsed. By his courageous initiative, outstanding fortitude and concern for the safety of others in the face of grave personal danger, Private First Class Yoakum contributed to the saving of two men who otherwise might have perished, and his heroic conduct and selfless efforts throughout reflect the highest credit upon himself and the United States Naval Service. He gallantly gave his life for his country."

"For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity as a Machine Gun Platoon Leader of Company F, Second Battalion, Twenty-fourth Marines, Fourth Marine Division, in action against enemy Japanese forces on Iwo Jima, Volcano Islands, 3 March 1945. Observing that a rifle platoon in the company had become disorganized due to casualties, Second Lieutenant Young assumed command of the unit in the face of intense fire and, after reorganizing it, made a reconnaissance under heavy fire, thereby finding a route of approach into the enemy position. Attacking with his platoon, he neutralized the bunkers with explosives and, annihilating at least fifteen of the Japanese in the foxholes, continued until he had secured the ridge to the rear of the hostile position. After setting up a defense, he went forward one hundred yards with a runner to determine which were enemy-held positions, thus aiding his company in the successful advance the following day. "For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity while serving with the First Marines, First Marine Division, in combat against enemy Japanese forces in the Solomon Islands Area on the night of October 13-14, 1942. Voluntarily hurrying to fires started by enemy incendiaries and intense heavy shelling by a Japanese battleship offshore, Sergeant Major Young and two other marines succeeded in putting out two fires during the height of the bombardment and assisted in combating another in an adjacent area. When a direct hit on a dug-out trapped five of his comrades, he fearlessly went to their aid and assisted in extricating the wounded and removing them to a place of safety. As the Army units had just moved into bivouac that night and were undergoing their initial experience under fire, he and other marines made a reconnaissance of the area, offering assistance and looking for the wounded whom they removed to safety. "For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity as Commanding Officer of Company I, Third Battalion, Twenty-eighth Marines, Fifth Marine Division, in action against enemy Japanese forces on Iwo Jima, Volcano Islands, on 19 and 20 February 1945. Landing in an area which was being subjected to a heavy barrage of enemy rifle, mortar and machine-gun fire, Captain Young found that his rifle company had intermingled with another unit which had previously landed. Despite the hostile fire, he moved from platoon to platoon, issuing orders and providing the necessary incentive to enable his men to move forward and clear the extremely dangerous beach sector. Shortly afterwards, despite grievous shrapnel wounds in the arm and back, Captain Young succeeded in assembling his company in the battalion area and directed the establishment of an effective night defensive position. Although suffering from his wounds, he summoned his Platoon Leaders on the following morning, briefed them in the plan for the continuation of the attack on Mount Suribachi and moved forward with his assault platoons. Wounded very seriously in the chest during this advance, he retained consciousness and transferred his company to his second in command. When fierce mortar, machine-gun and rifle fire pinned down his company during its attack on a strongly-fortified ridge, First Sergeant Young unhesitatingly exposed himself to this fire in order to direct the employment of his company's machine guns. By his sound judgment in the selection of advantageous positions for the guns and his skillful direction of their fire which completely silenced the enemy, he enabled his company to continue its advance. Although seriously wounded by a hostile sniper, he refused to be evacuated and remained on the front lines to lead the machine gun section until the ridge had been taken. "For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity as Acting Platoon Leader, serving with Company B, First Battalion, Twenty-Sixth Marines, Fifth Marine Division, during action against enemy Japanese forces at Iwo Jima, Volcano Islands, from 27 February to 6 March 1945. When his platoon leader became a casualty during a furious engagement with the enemy on 27 February, Sergeant Young promptly assumed command and, fearlessly leading his men in repeated aggressive attacks during the sustained advance of our forces, contributed materially to the success of his company in overcoming fierce hostile resistance. Driving forward against an objective vital to the defense of his sector the night of 1 March, he led his platoon through one hundred yards of shattering machine-gun fire and, launching a determined strike, gained his position with a minimum of casualties among his men. With his platoon pinned down during a fierce action on 6 March, he continued his same daring tactics and, penetrating hostile fire lanes alone to locate the source of the deadly barrage, directed supporting weapons in eliminating the stronghold before he was fatally struck down by a sudden shellburst. Sergeant Young's forceful and inspiring leadership, bold initiative and vallant devotion to duty in the face of tremendous odds were essential factors in the success of the bitterly fought Iwo campaign and reflect the highest credit upon himself and the United States Naval Service. Exposing himself to the intense and accurate fire, Lieutenant Colonel Youngdale reorganized and dispersed his group in order to present smaller targets to the enemy and, although several of his men sustained wounds, undoubtedly saved several lives by his action. Crawling forward in the face of machine-gun fire, he located a position with a better defilade, returned to the original location and led his men forward. "For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity while attached to a detachment of Marine Observation Squadron TWO FIFTY-ONE in action against enemy Japanese forces in the Solomon Islands Area from October 26 to December 10, 1942. In this prolonged series of intense hostile activities, First Lieutenant Yunck, displaying superb airmanship participated in numerous hazardous missions, serving as leader of an eight-plane flight of fighters during the latter part of the period. On one occasion when his plane was so badly damaged by anti-aircraft fire that he was forced to land in the sea, First Lieutenant Yunck, through his own resourcefulness and sheer determination, made his way back, after three weeks, to his base on Guadalcanal to resume flight duties. Later, while leading a four-plane fighter group, he personally accounted for three of six enemy aircraft shot down in a vigorous engagement, and in this action received such extensive damage to his own plane that all the navigational instruments ceased to function. Despite this severe handicap and under extremely adverse conditions imposed by darkness and heavy rain, First Lieutenant Yunck, with excellent judgment and superior professional ability, successfully returned to his base.
